applymate .co.in

You Prepare for Interviews. We Handle the Job Search.

A managed AI job-search agent that finds the roles worth your time, finds the people who actually hire for them, and starts the conversation from your own email and WhatsApp.

Not a mass auto-apply tool

We do not fire your CV into application forms. We reach people.

Sent as you

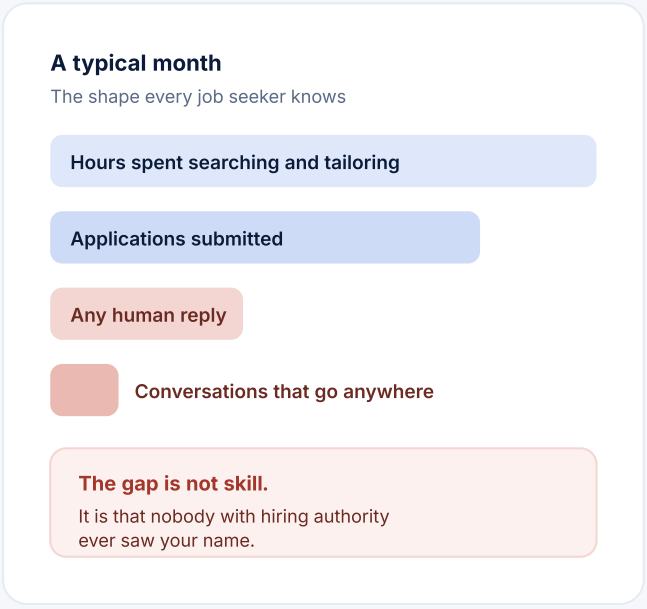

Messages leave from your own accounts, so replies come back to you.

Reviewed by a human

Nothing runs until your profile is read and your plan is set.

You are not short of effort. You are short of replies.

Most job seekers are doing the work correctly and still hearing nothing. The failure is not your CV. It is the channel: an application form is a queue, and a queue has no one in it.

Illustrative shape of a self-run search, not measured data.

WHAT IT ACTUALLY COSTS YOU

Two hours an evening scanning listings. The same CV sent for the fortieth time. A message you rewrite from scratch for every company. Threads scattered across email, WhatsApp and a job board inbox. And the quiet, corrosive part: not knowing whether anything you sent was ever opened.

Four things are going wrong at once

- Volume beats relevance. You apply widely because you cannot tell which roles are genuinely a fit.
- The form is a wall. Applications land in a system, not in front of the person who decides.
- Personalisation does not scale. The message that would work takes 40 minutes to write.
- Momentum dies. A reply arrives while you are at work; by the evening the thread has gone cold.

Every one of those is a process problem. Process problems can be handed to something that never gets tired, never forgets to follow up, and never sends the same paragraph twice.

A managed agent that works the people side of your job search.

ApplyMate is not a job board, not a CV builder, and not a bot that submits application forms on your behalf. It is a service that finds relevant openings, works out who hires for them, and opens a real conversation with those people in your name.

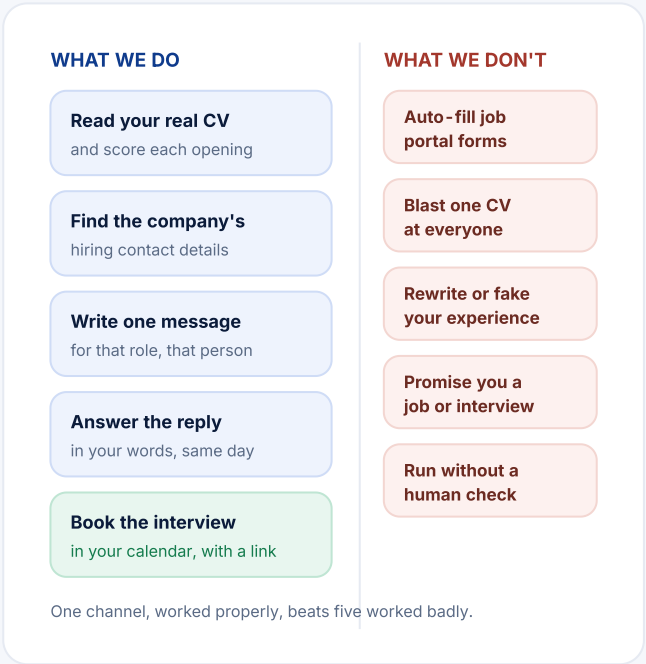

THE DIFFERENCE IN ONE LINE

Auto-apply tools optimise for the number of forms submitted. ApplyMate optimises for the number of real conversations started with people who can say yes.

What you are actually buying

- Relevance. Openings are scored against the CV you uploaded, and only strong matches move forward.
- Access. We find the company's hiring contact details and approach the right few people, not an inbox.
- Voice. Every message is written for that role and that company, from your own account.
- Continuity. Replies are answered, follow-ups are sent, and the thread keeps moving while you work.
- Visibility. You can see every message, every contact and every booking in your own portal.

It is managed, not self-serve: a person reviews your profile, sets your plan and your sending limits, and only then does the agent start.

The posting is the door. A person opens it.

For every opening that passes your relevance threshold, we research the company and find the contact details of the people who hire for that role. Then we approach a small, deliberate set of them — never an entire org chart.

Illustrative. Roles and caps are configured per account.

THE PAIN THIS REMOVES

You already know the uncomfortable truth: the person who can hire you almost never reads the application pile. Getting to them is a research job most people cannot do at scale, and a social risk most people will not take forty times a month.

Why restraint is the feature

- Two relevant people beat twenty random ones. A specific message to the right manager gets read. A mass mail gets filed.
- Your name stays clean. Caps and seniority rules mean no company ever feels carpet-bombed by you.
- Known companies are reused. Research we already hold is reused rather than repeated, so your plan is spent on reach, not lookups.
- Anyone can opt out. A contact who asks not to be approached is recorded and never contacted again.

This is the part you cannot buy with effort alone, and it is the single biggest reason ApplyMate users get into conversations that a job portal would never have produced.

Six steps, running every day, without you in the loop.

From the moment your account is activated, this is the loop that runs on your behalf — and each step has a limit, a rule and a record attached to it.

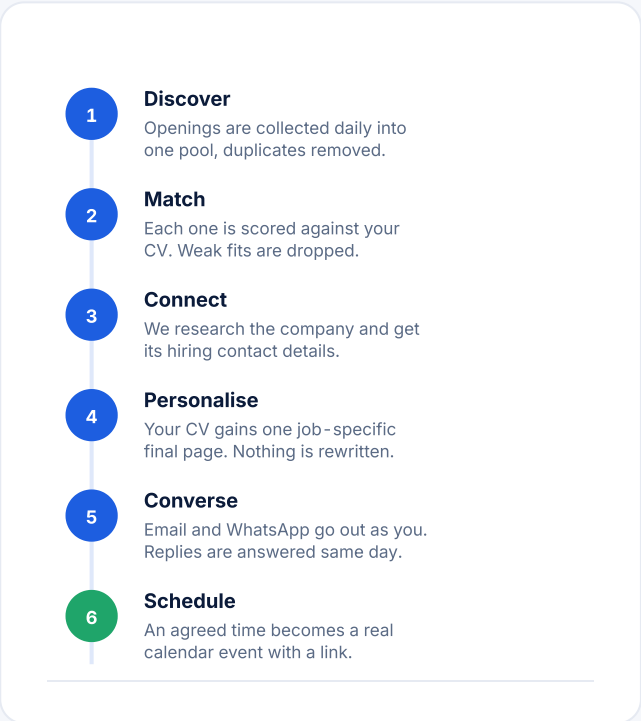

THE USP

Most tools stop at step 2. The value is in steps 3 to 6 — the research, the introduction, the reply and the booking — because that is the work that actually converts an opening into a conversation.

What it feels like from your side

- Morning: matches appear in your portal, already scored and attached to real companies.
- During the day: introductions go out inside your daily limits, each one written for one role.
- When someone answers: the agent replies from your material, within hours, not days.
- If there is interest: a time is proposed inside your allowed hours and written to your calendar.
- Every evening: a short summary on WhatsApp — jobs found, companies approached, messages sent, replies received.

Follow-ups are handled too, and they stop the moment someone replies. Nobody gets chased after they have answered you.

Your CV gains a page. It never loses one.

This is the part people are most protective about, and rightly so. The file you upload is sent exactly as you wrote it. For each strong match we generate one additional final page and attach it behind your original.

What the employer opens

Your CV, exactly as you wrote it — then one page answering the only question they have: why this person, for this job?

THE PAIN THIS REMOVES

Re-tailoring a CV for every application is the single most demoralising task in a job search — forty minutes of work for a document that may never be read, and a creeping fear that you are editing yourself into someone you are not.

The rules we hold ourselves to

- Your pages are untouched. No rewriting, no reformatting, no quiet "optimisation" of your history.
- Evidence only. The generated page draws on what is already in your material. If your CV does not support a claim, the page does not make it.
- One page, one job. It is written against that specific job description, not a template with the company name swapped in.
- You can read it. Everything sent on your behalf is visible in your portal, including the CV that went out.

WHY THIS WINS

A hiring manager gets a familiar document plus a direct answer to "why you". That is a far stronger position than a perfectly keyword-stuffed CV sitting in a queue.

From your address. In your name. Replies come to you.

Outreach does not leave from a platform address. You connect your own email account and your own WhatsApp Business number, and every message goes out from there — which is exactly why it gets read.

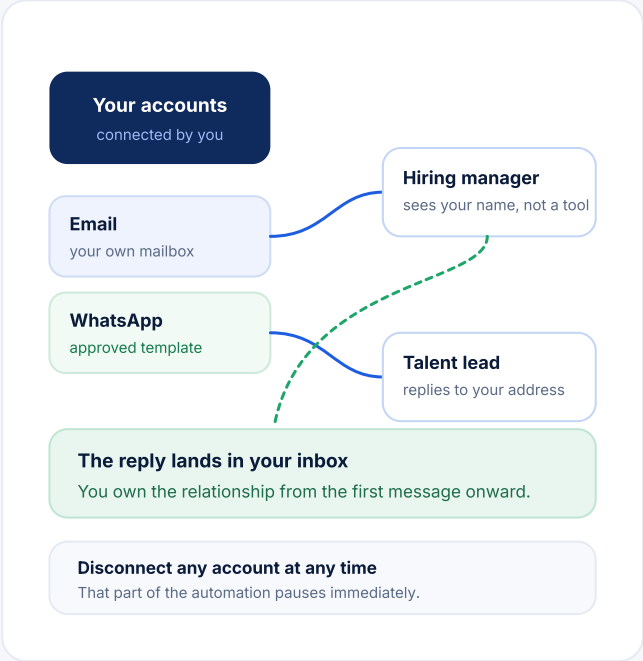

THE USP MOST PEOPLE MISS

A message from you is a message from a candidate. The same message from a platform is marketing. Identity is the difference between a reply and a deletion.

What that gives you

- Deliverability. Mail from a real, established mailbox behaves like real mail.
- Ownership. Replies, contacts and history live in your account — not locked inside a tool you might stop paying for.
- Credibility. On WhatsApp, the first message uses a pre-approved business template, as the platform requires. After someone replies, the conversation is a normal conversation.
- Control. Connect or disconnect your email, calendar or WhatsApp yourself, whenever you want.

Nothing is sent from an address you have not connected, and nothing is sent to anyone outside the rules set for your account.

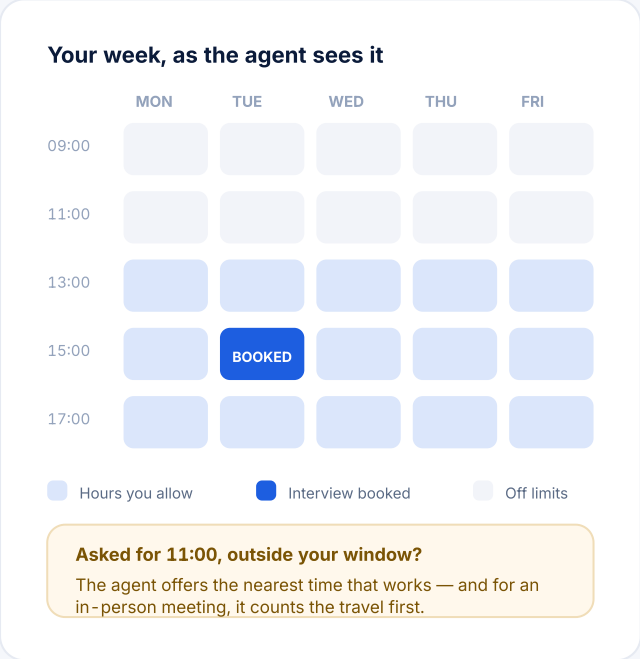

Interviews land inside the hours you can actually do.

The most expensive thing a job seeker loses is an interview that was offered at a time they could not take. Scheduling is treated as a first-class part of the service, not an afterthought.

THE PAIN THIS REMOVES

Juggling interview requests around a current job, a time zone, or a city you have to cross — and the silent damage of a double-booking or a "sorry, I can't make that" three emails into a promising thread.

Illustrative week. Your real windows are set on your account.

What the agent checks before it answers

- Your allowed interview hours, including meeting type and length.
- Your existing calendar, so you are never offered a slot you are already in.
- Travel time between an in-person meeting and whatever comes next, with a safety buffer.
- Both sides' agreement, before anything is written to the calendar.

Once it is agreed, the event is created in your calendar, the joining link is sent back on the same channel the conversation happened on, and you get a notification. If a time genuinely cannot be resolved, it is escalated rather than guessed.

QUIETLY DECISIVE

Most opportunities are not lost at the CV stage. They are lost in the three days it took to agree a time.

Automation you can read line by line.

Handing your job search to software is only reasonable if you can see exactly what it did. Every action the agent takes is recorded, labelled and visible in your own portal.

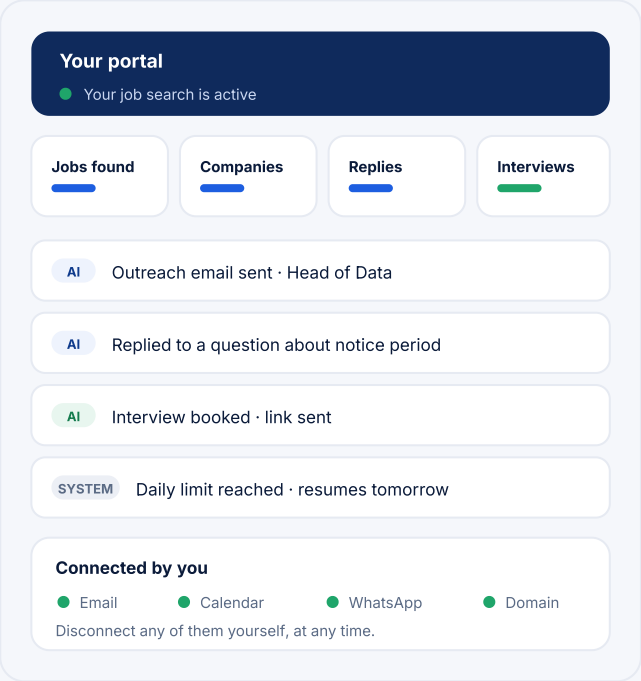

Every message is attributable

- Labelled actions. Anything the agent sent or answered carries an explicit AI label. You are never guessing who wrote what.
- Full history. Companies approached, people contacted, messages both ways, CVs sent, interviews booked — searchable by company name.
- Hard limits. Daily sending caps are enforced for your account. The agent stops when it hits them and tells you.
- Your data only. You see your own account. Nothing is shared between candidates.

MANAGED, ON PURPOSE

ApplyMate is run as a service, not a self-serve dashboard. Your plan, limits, contact rules and interview windows are set and maintained for you — so the system cannot run away with your reputation, and you are not left configuring a machine while you are trying to find work.

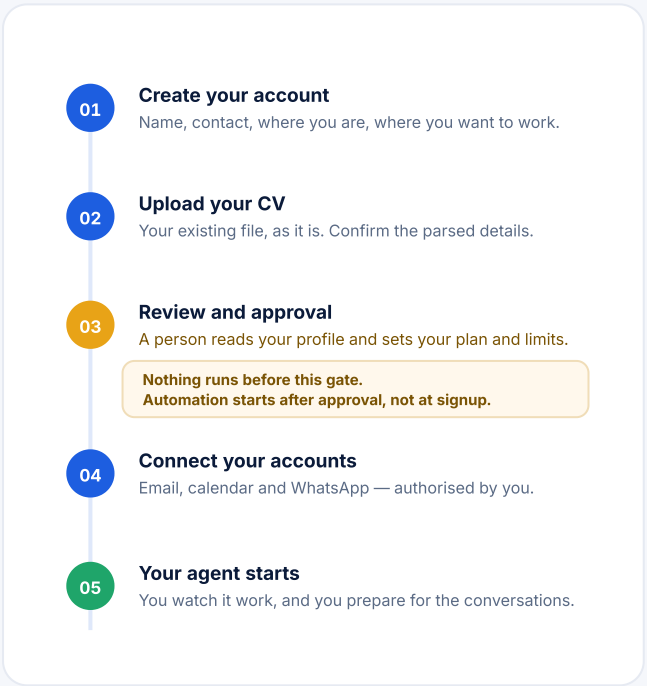

Your part is small and clear: connect your accounts, keep your profile accurate, and prepare for the conversations that come back.

Illustrative portal view. No real account data is shown.

Five steps. One of them is a human reading your profile.

ApplyMate is not self-serve, and that is deliberate. Your plan is built around where you are searching and how much reach you need, which is why it is set by a person rather than picked from a pricing table.

About the plan and the price

There is no single public price, because there is no single service. A modest local search and a wide international one need different limits, and the cost follows the limits.

- Your plan defines the countries searched, the daily introductions on each channel, who gets contacted and your interview hours.
- You see it before it starts. The plan and its price are agreed with you, and your account is activated only after you accept.
- Limits are enforced, not suggested. The agent cannot exceed them, and you can watch today's usage in your portal.

Start with your profile.

A few minutes to submit, nothing to pay. We read it, come back with a plan, and only then does anything run.

applymate.co.in

ApplyMate reduces the repetitive work of reaching relevant opportunities. It does not guarantee interviews, offers or employment, and it does not submit applications on job portals on your behalf. Outreach runs only from accounts you connect, within the limits set for your account, and anyone we contact can ask not to be contacted again.